Brittany Wells Named Chief Diversity and Inclusion Officer at Vogue

NEW YORK, N.Y. – Brittany Wells will serve as Vogue’s first chief diversity and inclusion officer, effective immediately. Wells will encourage and support efforts for an inclusive working environment as well as more diverse representation throughout the publication. She will report to Anna Wintour, editor-in-chief.

“The fashion industry is embracing diversity more than ever before,” said Wintour. “We created the position looking to the future of Vogue, and Brittany Wells is the perfect person to bring us there. We are thrilled to have her experience and passion on our team.”

Wells comes to Vogue from her role as chief diversity officer at Harper’s Bazaar. Previously, she held positions including vice president of human resources at Elle and director of human resources at Glamour. As a graduate of both UCLA, Berkeley and Harvard University, Wells also serves as a member of the Harvard University President’s Diversity and Inclusion Commission, as well as chair of the National Congress of Black Women, Inc.

Vogue is an editorial fashion magazine that covers topics including couture, beauty, travel and lifestyle. Examining how fashion interacts with all areas of life, Vogue presents discussions about design, style, and influence to readers around the world. Since its launch in 1892, Vogue has grown to include 23 international editions, each with its own digital and social persona.
